STONE-AGE PEOPLE CONDUCTED BRAIN SURGERY SUCCESSFULLY

09

In 1996, a skeleton was unearthed from a Neolithic burial site in Alsace, France. The skeleton belonged to a man around 50 years of age who was believed to have died around 5000 BCE. Despite living 7,000 years ago, the man underwent surgery on his skull and survived for some time afterwards. The researchers who recovered his skull noticed that roughly circular pieces of it had been surgically removed in two places, which is known as trepanation. One segment was around 6.5 centimetres long, and the other around 9.5 centimetres long. While the reason for him undergoing these surgeries is unknown, other ancient cultures used trepanation as a treatment for ailments such as headaches, epilepsy and mental illnesses. The surgery carried numerous risks, including haemorrhage, brain damage and infection, yet the researchers determined that the man survived for at least a decent period after the procedures. The bone around one of the trepanation holes had partially healed, while the other had fully healed, sealing the hole completely.

The process of trepanation was used in ancient times to treat numerous ailments, and over time the skull could heal

Trepanation has been practised across the ages in many cultures

The brain uses about 20 per cent of our oxygen intake

IF YOU REPEAT SOMETHING ENOUGH, IT LOSES MEANING

Semantic satiation occurs when we repeat a word enough in succession that it loses its meaning

10

Words are the product of when our brains connect a particular sound to a specific meaning. Our brains are incredibly adept at maintaining this connection, providing us the power of language and the means to readily communicate complex ideas with another human that shares this knowledge. However, we can temporarily but rapidly sever the connection between sound and meaning, and we can do this simply by repeating a word. This effect is known as semantic satiation, where repetition strips a word of its meaning and renders it just a sound. You may have encountered this effect when vocalising a word over and over, perhaps when practising saying it or demonstrating its phonetics. Semantic satiation is believed to be caused by saturation of the brain with the same input, lessening the effect of the input to the point where it has no effect.

5 BRAIN MYTHS BUSTED

1 TEN PER CENT

While neurons may be heavily outnumbered by other brain cells, we employ much more than ten per cent of our brain for almost all actions, even for simple ones, such as gripping an item.

2 MALE VS FEMALE

Males and females have historically been attributed to have different cognitive abilities for certain tasks, but recent studies show this isn't the case. For example, a study looking at maths ability in children from 68 countries found no differences between the two sexes.

3 TEACH AN OLD DOG NEW TRICKS

While people may become unwilling to learn new skills when they grow older, the neurons in their brains are still able to form new connections, so they remain able to learn, permitting the desire to learn.

4 BIGGER THAN OUR ANCESTORS

We may feel smarter than any humans who came before us, but counterintuitively our brains are around ten per cent smaller than our ancestors' from several millennia ago.

5 BRAIN FOG ISN'T REAL

Although it isn't a medical term, brain fog describes when the brain's usual clarity is lacking, causing forgetfulness, confusion and slower mental processing.
