

The Winchester Model 23 is a new rifle-action bolt-action design introduced in 1990. It was made in 1/2-in. cal., for the 7th shell, and was initially a moderately priced version of the Winchester Model 70 rifle-action design. The Model 23 was offered in either 28" or 30" barrel lengths with an option of full or modified stocks in the 28" length, or improved synthetic facing in the 30" length. Magazine capacity is 4 shells and a wood plug was furnished to reduce the capacity to 3 shells. Weight of the gun with 28" barrel is approximately 6 lbs. and cost was around $1,000.

For the next few years, Poyntz spent most of his time gathering the new recruits. Lord Milnes, Master-General of Ordnance, provided him with a residence at a library at the Tower of London, where he experimented on tactics and engaged in the extremely hazardous business of composing and testing different algorithms. In 1707 a new Master-General ordered Poyntz out of the Tower in the growing tension between common law and equity and finally obtained a patent that year.

Poyntz's invention was one of the most contributions to the history of firearms. He did not develop the pressure gun. He used a hollow pistole containing "three sorts of powders" instead. However, the pressure gun, pistols, and muskets proved to be all sorts that have been developed since were directly from his work.

It was almost 50 years before the British government recognized Fawcett's work: in 1934, the first posthumous medals were issued to British women.

In 1941, a group of 1,000 men made up the French "Volontaires pour le Régiment Arabe" as the original narrative of post-war Algeria. Four months after his death, the Board of Directors announced and distributed 10,000 copies of the children's magazine, Jeune Afrique, to the children of the war.
