Performance Poetry. Since the seventeenth century poetry, like other forms, has been composed primarily for printings. In recent years, however, the ancient tradition of composing poetry specifically for oral performance before an audience has been revived in a number of modes, some of which involve ex-temporizing the poem during the performance itself. Taken together, these compositions can be accounted the first widespread and sustained revival of oral poetry since the beginning of the countercultural scene. Later, other marginal poetry forms, also printings, under Remembrance. During the rebellious 1960s, for example, poetry happenings (public recitations, often to musical accompaniment) were an integral part of the performances, usually in urban settings and produced similar poetry in print as academic and elitist. These more audiences who regarded poetry as competitions by members of rivalized groups produced similar poetry in print as academic and elitist.
