Vocabulary:

Mini-Lesson

Connection: Listen to this quote, and think about why I am mentioning it today, when my real goal is to help you write more about your books: "You may not realize it, but a book's the best way for the best thing in the world for you."
 Here is a related quote from author Shannon Baker. Think about how it relates to growing ideas about characters: "I wish stories were linked to their characters... But I guess trouble is more interesting to read about."

Teach: Today I want to remind you that to grow possible interpretations from a text, it helps to study times when the characters face trouble. Think: what lesson does the author teach us through the way the character learns how to handle the problem?

Let's try it. You already know the troubles Michael faces in "Daddy." Turn and share with your problem the list of problems he faces. (He's living with his aunt who is a stranger to him, his parents recently died, and he is lonely.)

I can take one of these problems (Michael is incredibly lonely) and think about the scenes where Michael learns to deal with the problem. Which is this:

I will study the scene at the end where Michael and Aunt Esther are sitting on the couch together. (Think: Michael is learning something about ways to deal with the problem in this scene. Let's zoom in on that.)
 What now you read he read the scene closely to determine what the character learned about ways to deal with a problem and what readers can learn as a result. Read the scene where Michael and Aunt Esther are sitting together on the couch. Michael is dealing with loss by crying when his aunt reminds him of it. He hasn't let himself feel sad before. As I continue reading, think about what Michael learns about ways to deal with his problem. Remember to think about what the author is teaching us through the way this character learns to handle the problem.

Active Engagement: Did you see how the way literary analysts think interpretively is, by studying scenes where their characters deal with trouble? They re-read those scenes closely by asking: what does the character learn about ways to deal with this problem? And what does the author teach us through the way this character learns to handle the problem? They can write long to develop their thinking about those themes.

- Coach some hand groups as they identify the problems in their own texts and then re-read scenes tied to the problems, noting the lessons learned or themes.
- Turn and share with your group a few problems your character is facing.

Link: Remember that analysts often study times when their characters face trouble, and regularly there are lessons or themes to be learned from their responses. Introduce how they grow ideas on And her Chart.
