Prejudice and Discrimination

Prejudice and discrimination are major social problems in society today. Many people are discriminated against based on their color, nationality, social status, sexual orientation, and religious affiliations. Strategies need to be put in place to mitigate this issue following its adverse impacts on the affected. Racism is one of the common types of prejudice and discrimination in society today, where people are discriminated against based on their color and cultural backgrounds. Discrimination based on sexual orientation is becoming more prominent today following a civilization from rapidly changing technology which stands as one of the major causes of behavioral change. This paper will scrutinize prejudice and discrimination in society. The origin, causes, and effects of prejudice and discrimination in society will be discussed in this paper. This paper involves a review of literature on prejudice and discrimination issues; thus, credible and first-hand information will be needed. For this reason, primary sources of data will be utilized for well-examined and evaluated data concerning the research topic.

Prejudice and Discrimination

As defined by Di Stasio and Larsen (2020), prejudice is the biasing of a particular group of people based on their membership in social settings. Prejudice also refers to the dislike of an individual or a group of individuals without a logical idea. It is usually a belief that a certain group of people is more advantaged than others, which results in this social problem. Similarly, Krosch et al. (2017) defined discrimination as the unjust treatment of people based on their sex, age, color, and cultural backgrounds. Discrimination cases in society are increasing rapidly following civilization, mainly leading to changes in gender identity, gender impression, and sexual orientation.

Origin of Prejudice and Discrimination

Prejudice and discrimination are integral parts of human experiences, which manifest in different ways in our daily lives. This is a common universal social issue evident in societies following its major impacts on the affected. According to Krosch et al. (2017), prejudice and discrimination have their roots in genetic or evolutionary heritage, highly influenced by individual and cultural factors. Historical factors also play a role in the origin of prejudice and discrimination in society today. Many people from different cultural backgrounds have made culture inevitable is the main origin of this social problem. Prejudice and discrimination origin is based on an evolutionary basis, like human subsistence groups. Culture assigns different values to the society in which all individuals are supposed to live to their standards, of which those that do not are observed as outcasts. The evolution model for the origin and development can be used for an extensive understanding of the roots of prejudice and discrimination (Veit et al., 2021). The model bases its arguments on genes, anatomy, behavior, and social and physical aspects of directing the psychological development of this social issue. The model states that genes and culture co-evolve over time which is sustainable over generations. Genes and culture influence how prejudice and discrimination originated as an initial case and will continue recurring over generations. As genes and culture evolve, unjust treatment will also be passed from one social group to another, creating a spiral problem that keeps repeating itself.
