

CHAPTER II

LITERATURE REVIEW

2.1 Introduction

Considering our study relates to the impact of team sports regarding support to the volleyball players, we identified different studies that will help explicate further.

According to Carlson, B., & Engerbrechtsen, L. (2014). "Injury prevention in sports: An overview of systematic reviews" reveals increasing evidence exists for all age groups, that physical activity is more important in both prevention and treatment of some of the most sizeable conditions of our time, including cardiovascular disease, diabetes, cancer, hypertension, obesity, osteoporosis, and depression. Although overall population levels of physical activity is a general concern, increasing levels of leisure time, physical activity, and sports participation have been reported in some population groups. Injuries are virtually the sole drawback of exercise, but may be a common consequence of physical activity and have been shown to pose substantial problems. Nonetheless, in the study of Al-shehri, M. A., & Alshamrani, R. A. (2021). "The effects of Volleyball Training on Physical Fitness and Skills for University Students in Saudi Arabia." It reveals that volleyball has been popularized to a very high degree in China's major universities, and college students have a strong interest in participating in volleyball events. Therefore, the development of volleyball in colleges and universities has a certain scale. In addition, relevant courses are also constantly improving. Compared with other sports, volleyball not only puts forward certain requirements for college students' sports ability, but also has certain requirements on the skill level. Therefore, participating in volleyball is great help to improve the overall quality for college students.

The study conducted by Yoon, J., & Lee, Y. S. (2023). "Effects of Volleyball Training on Physical and Psychological Variables in Adolescent Students" states that the ability to maintain balance, either dynamic, is a great importance for performing everyday activities, as well as for the development and optimization of an athlete's basic motor skills. It is also one of the most important skills that protect from injury. It has been established that highly trained athletes show more accurate postural control than sedentary subjects, and differences in postural control become noticeable between trained and untrained adolescents. However, in the study of Saavedra, J. M., Escobar, R., Vera, M., & Cosmo-Bolanos, M. (2019). "The impact of a School based program of dance and volleyball on the physical fitness of adolescents" reveals that the study evaluated the impact of a school-based program that included volleyball on physical fitness in adolescents. It found that the program led to significant improvements in physical fitness, particularly in areas such as agility and muscular endurance.

2.2 Prior Research

In this study, Martin-Albo, J. L., Navarro, J. G., & Grijalvo, F. (2017). Stated that "Effects of a mindfulness-based intervention on psychological burnout and perceived stress among sport coaches" sought to examine the effects of a mindfulness-based intervention helped reduce levels
