

Lungs With Emphysema

Emphysema

With emphysema, the air sacs (alveoli) and small airways (bronchioles) are damaged and lose their elasticity (if you think of the air sacs as little balloons, they are worn out and never able to return to their normal size). When you breathe out, stale air becomes trapped inside the air sacs. This makes it harder for fresh air (oxygen) to come in and carbon dioxide (CO_2) to go out. The blood vessels around the air sacs are also damaged, which prevents fresh air (oxygen) from reaching the blood stream and carbon dioxide (CO_2) from going out of the body.

Lungs With Chronic Bronchitis

Chronic Bronchitis

With chronic bronchitis, the airways (bronchial tubes) become swollen and inflamed and produce large amounts of mucus. The swollen tissues and mucus can make breathing difficult, because the inside of the tubes become narrow or closed in. The airways (bronchial tubes) often become easily infected, because it is difficult to cough out the excess mucus.
