

might be able better to comprehend pragmatism as a reaction against a certain strain in philosophy—its habit of setting itself up as a foundational discipline whose authority rests upon the “privileging” of certain methods and representations—rather than as a crass utilitarianism-of-ideas.

Furthermore, in his discussion of relativism, Devine begs an important question. He claims that if some differences of standard are ultimate, then neither of the standards can be judged superior or inferior, since there is no further standard to which one can appeal to settle the issue. This assumes that all rational conflict resolution depends upon explicit (or explicable) criteria that will spell out in a way acceptable to anyone how the dispute can be settled. Borrowing Rorty’s terminology, “rationality” equals “commensurability” for Devine. But it is precisely this point about the equivalence between reason and commensuration that many recent philosophers—such as Thomas Kuhn, Hans-Georg Gadamer, Hilary Putnam and others—have questioned.

If rationality does not turn on the existence of universal standards available to any and all rational inquirers, both the relativist’s skepticism about criteria and Devine’s rejoinder lose much of their point. This, in turn, raises the deeper issue of why, or whether, it is important for theists in general and Christians in particular to put much stock in the outcome of epistemological controversy. It is one thing for the believer to profess one’s faith as justified and to gather good reasons in its behalf; it is quite another to claim that all reasons gesture in its direction and that the refusal of faith risks logical incoherence. The thirst for a transcendental vindication of one’s convictions, even when one possesses solid, everyday rationales for them, and even when the prospects for a priori victory look dimmer by the day, is hard to quench. Despite its manifest virtues, Relativism, Nihilism, and God falls victim to this common philosophical urge, the impulse to abandon the everyday task of securing one’s beliefs in the forum of dialogue and debate and flee into the arms of an appealing but illusory necessity.
