Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness of 10-year-old children. The study was conducted in a primary school in the city of Ankara, Turkey. The study group consisted of 20 children (10 boys and 10 girls) who were randomly selected from the 10-year-old children in the school. The children were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group did not participate in any physical education program, while the experimental group participated in a 12-week training program. The physical fitness of the children was measured at the beginning and at the end of the 12-week period. The measurements included maximum heart rate, maximum oxygen consumption, maximum power, and maximum speed. The results of the study showed that the experimental group had significantly higher values for all four measurements at the end of the 12-week period compared to the control group. The results suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical fitness of 10-year-old children.

¹ To address the issue, the authors first tested the model with the same dependent variable as in the previous study, the number of employees. The results were similar to those reported in the previous study.

As noted earlier, the 2004 election was a watershed year for the U.S. health insurance industry. The election resulted in a change of control of the White House, and the passage of the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act of 2003 (MMA). The MMA was a landmark piece of legislation that provided for a new Medicare drug benefit, and it also included provisions that would affect the private health insurance market. The MMA was a significant step in the effort to reform the Medicare program, and it was a key part of the Bush administration's agenda.
