It is an irony that these other young people in "The Golden Age" are the only ones who do not receive the same intense interest and respect as the narrator is. The narrator's feelings of being the "golden child" are also a source of pain, as he must guard against losing his status. His frequent feelings of isolation, as he is unable to understand or connect with anyone, heighten his sense of being an outcast in his community. Following is a list of the narrator's feelings and thoughts, which are the result of his feelings of being the "golden child":

It's not possible to make anyone responsible for someone's death. It's wrong to say that anyone should be held responsible. The 9/11 attacks were the result of a complex set of circumstances, including the actions of the hijackers, the failure of the FAA to detect the planes, the failure of the ATIS to provide accurate information, and the failure of the FAA to provide accurate information. It's not possible to make anyone responsible for someone's death.
