

More recently, primatologists and evolutionary psychologists (summarized in Boyd and Silk 2000:596ff.), argue that inbreeding avoidance is evolutionarily old—it characterizes all primate species, including humans. Therefore, it is likely that there is some as yet unspecified biological basis to inbreeding avoidance, expressed in the ethnographic record as an incest taboo. Leavitt (1990) has suggested that biosocial arguments do not present convincing evidence that incest avoidance is directly produced from our biological makeup. A less deterministic view would have it that cultural learning and genetic transmission are not mutually exclusive alternatives and may interact to produce incest avoidance in ways that are complex and flexible (Boyd and Silk 2000:583ff.).

The psychoanalytic argument is grounded directly in Freud's view that humans are innately incestuous because of the psychological processes of family life and the insistence of the sex drive. In psychoanalytic work primarily with women patients, Freud explored puzzling behaviors and symptoms with no known organic cause (for example, severe pain, paralysis, or blindness) involved in what was called "hysteria."⁴ In a paper read to his colleagues in April 1896 (and published that year) Freud announced his discovery that hysteria is the psychological consequence of actual incestuous experience: "At the bottom of every case of hysteria there are one or more occurrences of premature sexual experiences, occurrences which belong to the earliest years of childhood" (1961a:203, quoted in Davies and crenans have their breasts cut open, though they are invisible with X-rays, can all be found in the stories of seduction. [Bonaparte et al. 1954:190–191]

Nine months later Freud had replaced the seduction theory with his Oedipal theory, in which women's reports of paternal and fraternal sexual advances are understood and analyzed as unconscious fantasies generated by similarly unconscious childhood sexual wishes (Davies and Frawley 1994:11ff.). Freud's reversal had long-standing consequences for how psychology viewed patient reports of incestuous sex and for the choices that anthropologists made as to where to focus their studies. Psychology has, for the most part, returned to Freud's initial seduction theory, whereas anthropology has stayed with its long-standing focus on the taboo and on the cross-cultural validity of Oedipal theory.⁵

Problems with Anthropological Theories

Structuralist discussions, in failing to consider the importance of the incest taboo for protecting relationships based on primary attachment and trust, as between parents and children, neglect the psychological consequences of incest. To the extent that incest itself appears in their accounts, it is as an exceptional but institutionalized phenomenon occurring among elite groups in distant times and places, as, for example, in Arens's (1986) and Lévi-Strauss's (1969) excurses on incestuous royal marriages
