

Perception - Organization Behaviour

Importance of Perception: The importance of perception can be explained with the help of the SOBC (Stimulus-Organism- Behaviour-Consequence) model of organisational behaviour.

Perception can be divided into two types:-

- Visual Perception: Visual perception is a process through which stimulus is received through a naked eye and brain interprets what an individual sees. In visual perception, an individual initially receives the information through the visual system. After this, the individual processes information about the stimulus. The interpretation of information and its registration by the visual system forms the proximal stimulus.
- Auditory Perception: Auditory perception is a process through which stimulus is received through ear and brain interprets what an individual hears. The brain interprets the incoming noise into something useful and comprehensible. It also discriminates the various sounds in an individual's environment, referred to as auditory discrimination. Auditory discrimination is the process whereby an individual differentiates between sounds around him or her. For example, in a music concert, an individual is able to distinguish the sound of guitars from those of the piano.
- Stimulus: An organism perceives a stimulus from the environment. A stimulus potentially influences behaviour. There are two types of stimuli:
 - Overt stimuli: These are signals in the environment that are observable. For example, other individuals, and objects in the environment are overt stimuli.
 - Covert stimuli: These are signals in the environment that are not consciously observed. For example, cold weather stimulating an individual to light a fire is a covert stimulus.
- Organism: The organism uses his senses (sight, hear, touch, smell, and taste) to perceive the stimulus.
- Behaviour: The sensory data is interpreted in the human brain which marks the human behaviour towards the stimulus. The response to a stimulus is a particular instance of behaviour. The behaviour can be of the following types:
 - Overt behavior: It is an open and observable behavior.
 - Covert behavior: It is a hidden, concealed, or secretive behavior.

For example, when you play chess with your friend, the act of moving a piece in response to your friend's move is overt behaviour. However, thinking and analysing that go in your mind before making the move is covert behaviour.

- Consequence: All types of behaviours result in an outcome. These outcomes can be of two types based on the effect they produce on an individual:
 - Positive Consequence: A positive consequence results in satisfaction and a desire to repeat the
