Qualitative research seems to be an oddity in institutes where health promotion, prevention of diseases, and public health issues form the core of research aims and development projects (Meisingset, 2016). When survey data are collected from thousands of respondents who have answered the questions carefully elaborated by scientists, qualitative data based on a couple of dozen thematic interviews may seem almost to be a joke. Researchers specialised in qualitative methodology may find it difficult to compete with colleagues whose purpose is to measure and monitor population behaviour, habits, and consumption, to indicate past and present trends in different phenomena related to health and to produce ready-to-use results (e.g., percentages and population estimates) for policy makers. When the various surveys are repeated regularly and long enough it is even possible to indicate societal changes. As a result, journalists prefer to contact the experts in public health and not the sociologists.

The mistrust in qualitative research originates from the problem of reliability (Johnson & Waterfield, 2004). However, the dilemma lies in the fact that qualitative research often seems to be too entangled with theories and its empirical output is seldom measurable. Thus it is difficult for scientists unfamiliar with qualitative research to assess its relevance and to understand what is evidence based and what is simply theorisation. No wonder that skilled researchers yield to the pressure and decide to abandon human-interest issues for mainstream topics (such as effectiveness, best practices, health promotion) in order to get published in high-impact journals, and to give up qualitative methods for quantitative software in order to ensure better chances of securing funding. Scientists who criticise qualitative research usually do not understand its scientific advantages and merits and are unaware of the various data collection techniques (e.g., focus-group interviews, ethnography) and its wide range of
