Nicole Roven Giuliani, 2011 Morphometric studies reveal that the volumes of many brain structures differ between clinical and non clinical populations Specifically populations characterized by affective disturbances related to heightened emotional reactivity and diminished emotion regulation have been found to possess smaller volumes of brain structures involved in emotion reactivity and regulation I sought to determine whether similar associations would be found between brain structure and trait emotion reactivity and regulation in healthy individuals Specifically I predicted that emotion reactivity as measured by negative affect would be negatively related to the volume of the ventral anterior cingulate cortex insula orbitofrontal cortex and amygdala and that emotion regulation as measured by usage of expressive suppression and cognitive reappraisal would be positively related to the volume of the dorsal and ventral anterior cingulate cortex dorsolateral prefrontal cortex hippocampus orbitofrontal cortex cerebellar vermis and anterior insula I tested these predictions using two complementary methods region of interest ROI and voxel based morphometry VBM In Study 1 which used a sample of healthy adult women trait usage of expressive suppression was correlated positively with the volume of the middle frontal gyrus and anterior insula and negatively with ventral anterior cingulate volume Trait usage of cognitive reappraisal was correlated positively with the volume of the bilateral dorsal anterior cingulate cortex All of these correlations were found using both ROI and VBM methods In Study 2 which used a more diverse sample of healthy males and females ranging in age from 10 to 22 self reported levels of trait negative affect was correlated negatively with posterior insula volume although this finding was not confirmed using VBM Both ROI and VBM revealed that trait suppression usage frequency was correlated positively with right ventral anterior cingulate and anterior insula volume The strength of the relationship between suppression and anterior insula volume increased as subject age increased Although no ROIs were found to correlate with trait reappraisal usage frequency VBM found that reappraisal positively correlated with gray matter clusters in the prefrontal cortex The findings from this dissertation demonstrate that the structural alterations seen in individuals suffering from mood and anxiety disorders may not result from psychopathology per se but may instead be on the lower end of the continuum of emotion reactivity emotion regulation and associated brain structure
