who constitutes a society's middle class and what they have and comparing their situation to counterparts in poorer and richer societies are particularly illuminating. Society's middle class marks off the standard

Rick Skeen is a cable splicer for a utility company in Pearland, Texas. The money that he and his wife Pettie—who is employed half time as a teacher in a Christian academy—earn puts them right in the center of the American middle class. They have a nice 1,600-square-foot home in a suburb of Houston, two kids, a dog. Certainly, there are many things the Skeen family would dread losing, but it is a safe bet that the array of kitchen appliances sitting on the washer, range, and dryer in the upper right-hand corner of the photograph would not be among them.

Ambrosio and Carmen Castillo Balderras and their four children are the Skeens' Mexican counterparts. Their home in Guadalajara, however, is less than half the size of the Skeens' and accommodates half again as many people. They too have possessions, both functional and prized, but they amount to far fewer things. Ernesto is a distributor of wholesale produce, does freelance welding, and when he has time, continues building his home. Carmen is a homemaker. Their income puts them in the Mexican middle class. Nevertheless, in dollar terms it is less than one seventh of what the Skeens earn.
