It is an irony that these other young people in "The Golden Age" are the only ones who do not receive the same intense attention as the narrator. In "The Golden Age," the narrator is so concerned with his own past that he does not notice the other young people who are also in the same situation. The narrator is so focused on his own past that he does not notice the other young people who are also in the same situation. It's not possible to make anyone responsible for someone's death. It's wrong to say nothing changed about justice. The 9-11 attacks show that disaster hits, that justice comes late, that people suffer forever. It's not just going back to where things were, but moving the system for good that we all live in. We're moving the system for good, not just for the victims of 9-11, but for everyone who lives in this world. We're moving the system for good, not just for the victims of 9-11, but for everyone who lives in this world.
