- (iii) The simultaneous equation method will yield more accurate allocations because it takes into account the fact that service departments serve each other whereas the step-wise method ignores such reciprocal usage. The step-wise method involves simpler computations and, in this question, does not give a significantly different answer. However, the step-wise method may yield inaccurate results where service costs are high and there are more than two service departments with significantly different usage ratios between the departments.

		1 (£)	2 (£)	A (£)	B (£)
Primary allocation	210 000	93 800	38 600	182 800	124 800

Notes

^a General factory overhead is apportioned to service cost centres before reallocation to production centres as indicated in note (i) of the question.

^b Because reciprocal allocations are not made, the costs allocated to service cost centre 1 are reallocated as follows:

£91 262 (63/72 × £104 300) to production cost centre A

£13 038 (9/72 × £104 300) to production cost centre B

^c Reciprocal charges are not made. Therefore the allocation is as follows:

4 000/29 000 × £59 600 = £8 221 to production cost centre A

25 000/29 000 × £59 600 = £51 379 to production cost centre B
