- Abstract • The effects of a single session of moderate intensity aerobic exercise on the ability to perform subsequent physical tasks were examined in 10 young men. After a baseline period of 60 min rest, subjects performed a series of four tasks: a 10-min rest, a 10-min work period, a 10-min rest, and a final 10-min work period. The first work period consisted of a 5-min rest followed by a 5-min period of moderate intensity aerobic exercise. The second and fourth work periods consisted of a 5-min rest followed by a 5-min period of moderate intensity aerobic exercise. The third work period consisted of a 5-min rest followed by a 5-min period of moderate intensity aerobic exercise. The results showed that the performance of the first work period was significantly higher than the other three work periods. This suggests that a single session of moderate intensity aerobic exercise can improve performance on subsequent physical tasks.
