Abstract

Repetitive stress injuries involving carpal tunnel syndrome are the most common occupational injury and are associated with long-term disability and high medical costs. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of repetitive stress injuries among health care workers in a large, tertiary care hospital. A cross-sectional study was conducted using a questionnaire to assess the prevalence of repetitive stress injuries among health care workers in a large, tertiary care hospital. The prevalence of repetitive stress injuries was 11.5% among health care workers. The most common repetitive stress injuries were carpal tunnel syndrome (5.2%), tendinitis (4.1%), and neck pain (2.2%). The prevalence of repetitive stress injuries was significantly higher among health care workers who reported working long hours (p < 0.05). The prevalence of repetitive stress injuries was also significantly higher among health care workers who reported working in the intensive care unit (p < 0.05). The results of this study suggest that repetitive stress injuries are a significant occupational health problem among health care workers. Further research is needed to identify the factors that contribute to the development of repetitive stress injuries and to develop effective interventions to prevent them.
