(1) Question 4.3

No, it does not matter.

If there are zero or low transaction costs, the Theorem of Coase applies and the railroad will operate the train with a spark arrester regardless whether the law protects the farmer from invasion by sparks or allows the railroad to emit sparks without liability. The private parties would always bargain their way to optimal behavior and cooperate to maximize their joint profits. The efficient outcome is the same in both scenarios, regardless of the rule of law.

However, alternative property rights will affect income distribution:

- A law protecting the farmer means the farmer saves $3,000 and the railway will install the spark arrester for $1,750. The farmer is $1,750 richer and the railway is $1,750 poorer.
- A law protecting the railroad means the farmer saves only $1,250 and the railway will install the spark arrester for $1,750 paid by the farmer by contract. The farmer is $1,750 poorer and the railway is $1,750 richer.
- If transaction costs exceed $1,250, and if the law allows the railroad to emit sparks without liability, the Theorem of Coase does not apply and the railroad will operate the train without a spark arrester.
- If transaction costs exceed $1,250, and if the law protects the farmer from invasion by sparks, the railroad will operate the train with a spark arrester.
