

WHAT MAKES A PLACE GREAT?

In his studies of public space, William H. Whyte observed the key indicators of a great place. These places have a high proportion of people in groups, and a wide variety of activities. People show affection to one another there, and a variety of users feel welcome.

When people describe public places, words like "lively," "fun," and "well moving" come up repeatedly. These types of adjectives describe the intangible qualities of a particular space. Intangible qualities can be measured quantitatively by using counting techniques or by conducting new research.

In studying more than 1,000 public spaces around the world, OMA has found four key qualities that generate these patterns of behavior, emotion, and memorable experience in public space: the Place Diagram on right. Great places are usually born in a variety of uses and activities, are well connected to their surroundings, and are comfortable and welcoming. The most successful public spaces always have all four characteristics.
