For the next few years, Poyntz spent most of his time gathering the new recruits. Lord Milnes, Master-General of Ordnance, provided him with a residence at a laboratory at the Tower of London, where he experimented on acids and engaged in the extremely hazardous business of decomposing and testing different substances. In 1787 a new Master-General ordered Poyntz out of the Tower in the growing-inevitable controversy his work in acids and finally obtained a patent that year.

Poyntz's invention was one of the most contributions to the history of chemistry. He did not win the prize money. He paid a heavy pecuniary compensation (three tons of gunpowder) instead. However, the government was grateful, and consequently granted to all men that have been distinguished since then awards for their work.

It was almost 50 years before the British government organized Farwell's wedding. In 1934, the last preserved wreath was used to honor him.

In 1941, a group of 1,000 men made up the French "Volontaires pour le Régiment Arabe" as the original narrative of post-war Algeria. Four months after his death, the Board of Directors announced and distributed 10,000 copies of the children's book, Le Petit Arabe, by Jacques J. Kervyn.
