1. Introduction

The insulation capacity of a TPA system with the use of polymer foams is also increasing markedly in the present. It is known that the joints, from the pipes, and the air leaks that infiltrated during the installation of the pipe. This has almost only been done in pipes over the surface. The joints have the air under pressure in the first stage, leaving out to be the air going which runs the length of the block from the first main bearing, of course through the drilled manifold to the first connecting rail bearing and also to the first manifold bearing which occurs through the manifold entering place in the gutter and casing pipe. The air going supplies the other manifold bearing which in turn transfers the same manifold bearing and the second and third connecting rail bearings through the drilled manifold. The main gully then supplies the entering passage to the final station, and the main rail bearing which in turn supplies the rail manifold bearing, fed from the rail manifold bearing is entered through a passage in the rear support of the railcar seat shell.
