

Advanced practice within learning disability nursing

Mark Jukes

Abstract

This article describes the application of advanced nursing practice within the field of learning disabilities. It discusses the differences between advanced practice and specialist practice and proposes that managers' perceptions of the role of advanced nurse practitioners (ANPs) within the management of developing services will need to change if such practitioners are to be effective. Six defined areas are explored to show how advanced nursing practice within learning disabilities may be developed to allow ANPs to assert their rightful position and influence.

Developments within learning disability services have largely been silently pioneered and championed by nurses ever since the publication of Better Services for the Mentally Handicapped (Department of Health and Social Security (DHSS), 1971). These developments have subsequently been delivered and promoted as a result of progressive government policy, accompanied by the over-arching philosophy of 'social role valorization' (Wolfensberger, 1983), previously known as 'normalization' (Wolfensberger, 1972). When first developed, this philosophy was seen as an attempt to create a more positive attitude within society towards people with learning disabilities.

It is also a philosophy by which professionals can be guided to operationalize and evaluate a more humane service for vulnerable individuals who are progressively living within independent community settings. In this new climate of health-care purchasing, contracts and mixed markets, this philosophy is currently being reassessed by some of its advocates (Brown and Smith, 1992; Gilbert, 1993) in terms of its direction, and whether its original values have been replaced by a worn dogma to suit the agendas of hungry, potential providers of services.

Both the philosophical and service developments have involved nurses and have followed models of care advocated, for example, by the King's Fund (1980). As a result, nurses' skills have progressively moved away from an institutional focus and become facility independent (Chief Nursing Officers of the UK, 1991).

Nurses have a significant contribution to make in terms of an established range of specialist skills (Sines, 1992), which are seen as sensitive, relevant and responsive to the needs of individual clients (UKCC, 1994). Nurses who embark upon specialist nursing pathways, such as the ENB 807 (ENB, 1989), have this qualification included as part of community health nursing degree programmes. It is also seen as appropriate for such programmes to be linked to the Framework of the ENB Higher Award characteristics (ENB, 1989, 1991). Nurses with this qualification are therefore able to focus and function as a specialist practitioner within the community. These skills, however, require both a further impetus and focus in terms of the effects and contributions of practitioners within today's seamless service provision if any change and influence is to be observed.

To achieve this, an advanced nurse practitioner (ANP) will:

'Be concerned with adjusting the boundaries for the development of future practice, pioneering and developing new roles responsive to changing needs and, with advancing clinical practice, research and education to enrich professional practice as a whole' (UKCC, 1994).

An ANP in learning disability will also contribute towards health policy and management by examining the processes, skills and frameworks that contribute to nursing practice, in a disciplined manner, looking towards the further development and provision of existing and future services. It is a role, therefore, which is distinct from specialist nursing practice. Furthermore, the rapid acceleration of deinstitutionalization programmes is likely to increase the demand for such appropriately placed advanced practitioners within the field, and this demand will have to be met if quality nursing and health care are to be effectively realized and evaluated.
