Oberlin's Experimental Hazelnut Orchard Naomi Fireman, 2019 Mitigating and adapting to climate change and transitioning to more sustainable agricultural methods to feed a growing human population are fundamental challenges today Woody agriculture holds potential for addressing both through food production and carbon sequestration To help assess this potential in 2011 Oberlin College planted an experimental orchard made up of 70 hybrid hazelnut trees treated with three levels of fertilization I asked the questions How does annual allocation of carbon to different tissues change over time as hybrid hazels mature How much carbon can this system store where is it stored and how does this change over time How does fertilization affect patterns of carbon allocation and long term storage Are genetically diverse trees capable of producing nut crops similar in scale to conventional commodity crops in the Midwest I documented a general increase in the production of all tissues in all treatments Soil carbon storage increased from 2011 to 2018 The only significant effect of fertilizer is an increase in the production of woody biomass suggesting hazelnuts are a low input crop In 2017 this still maturing orchard produced an estimated 2.1 tonnes hectare of in shell nuts compared to typical local soybean yields of 3.4 tonnes hectare In addition by the fall of 2018 the hazel plot had stored 12 tonnes hectare of woody biomass Although many challenges including cost effective harvest remain work in this small scale hazelnut orchard suggests strong potential for woody crops as low input high productivity systems that concurrently sequester carbon
