Depository receipts, sometimes referred to as depositary receipts, are issued by a foreign issuer to a U.S. investor. They are a type of security that represents ownership in a foreign company. They are typically issued by a U.S. company that has a subsidiary in the foreign country. The U.S. company then issues the depository receipts to the U.S. investor. The depository receipts are then traded on the U.S. stock market. This allows U.S. investors to invest in foreign companies without having to deal with the complexities of foreign markets. Depository receipts are also known as American Depositary Receipts (ADRs).
