Abstract

The purpose of this phenomenological inquiry was to examine persistence factors associated with the successful completion of a doctoral degree in the field of education. Standardized open-ended interviews with a purposeful sample of 76 participants (42 females, 34 males) generated data leading to themes describing what doctoral students experience (personal sacrifice, delayed expectations, dissertation challenges) and the personal factors (motivations for pursuing the degree, reasons for persisting, strategies for dissertation completion), social factors (support systems and coping mechanisms), and institutional factors (program characteristics) participants associated with their persistence. These findings provide a composite understanding of the essence of the struggles inherent in the journey and the factors associated with doctoral persistence. Implications and recommendations for doctoral candidates are discussed.

Keywords: persistence, doctorate, dissertation, attrition, phenomenology, teacher education

Introduction

Doctoral persistence is "the continuance of a student's progress toward the completion of a doctoral degree" (Bair, 1999, p. 8). Studies over the last four decades show that 40% to 60% of doctoral candidates at some stage in the process fail to demonstrate doctoral persistence; that is, they do not achieve their goal of earning a terminal degree (Berelson, 1960; Bowen & Rudenstine, 1992; Council of Graduate Schools Ph.D. Completion Project, 2008). This phenomenon of doctoral persistence and its converse, attrition, is most puzzling given that "Paradoxically, the most academically capable, most academically successful, most stringently evaluated, and most carefully selected students in the entire higher education system—doctoral students—are the least likely to complete their chosen academic goals" (Golde, 2000, p. 199).

In education graduate programs, the attrition rate is estimated to be 50% (Ivankova & Stick, 2007), and some reports indicate it may be as high as 70% (Nettles & Millet, 2006). Between 1983 and 2008 time-to-degree completion for graduate students in education programs increased from 11.7 years to 12.7 years, while decreasing from 8.2 years to 7.7 years in all other fields (National Science Foundation [NSF], 2009; Wao & Onwuegbuzie, 2011). Nettles and Millet (2006) found that across disciplines, education ranked lowest in doctoral student publications (15% compared to 30%) and presentations (30% compared to 37%).

The nature and responsibility of doctoral students enrolled in education programs may contribute to these statistics. The
