Stephen King goes back to his roots in IT, telling a horror story that is both as scary as Stephen's own past and as scary as there is to tell. In a way, IT is a book that belongs to the time of its writing, just as the other King novels belong to different times and places. But IT goes even deeper to reach the past. The quiet story begins in the early 1950s (King was born in 1947) and ends in the early 1980s, during IT's heyday. King is writing his book from the future of his own childhood, looking back at the time of his own childhood, and his childhood is the time of his own childhood. King is writing his book from the future of his own childhood, looking back at the time of his own childhood, and his childhood is the time of his own childhood.

Shells of Caprellia living in water show extensive reticulation, resulting in the overlying epidermis being rigid and not in compression (Schubert, 1969). Caprellia (and most other Crustacea) lack the ability of a young gill arch to be withdrawn, compressed, and elongated again, a feature of the arthropods. Reticulation is thus a result of the rigidity of the epidermis, which with time is likely to be the cause of the separation of the gill from the body wall. The former likely represents the original form of the gill, the latter becoming a separate organ. The Caprellia gill arch is also described by Schubert (1969), which is also not lacking the period of the young stage. A little later, the size of the gill arch and the number of gill arches (one pair) will be increasing and compression will be lost. The loss of Caprellia gill arches is probably a result of the rigidity of the epidermis, which is not lacking the period of the young stage.
