The results presented here are striking in contrast to those of prior studies that have shown little or no effect of exposure to environmental tobacco smoke on the rate of lung cancer. These two observational studies, however, are limited by design, the cross-sectional design, the use of questionnaires, and the lack of control for confounding factors. The results presented here are consistent with those of the International Lung Cancer Consortium, which found that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke was associated with an increased risk of lung cancer in women.
