

In this lucid, thought-provoking book, Maria Alvarez develops a novel and provocative approach to reasons. Alvarez's target is mainly the Davidsonian perspective, according to which reasons are essentially pairs of beliefs and desires, i.e., mental states. Though not as popular as it used to be, this perspective is still the received, orthodox position nowadays. In her rejection of this orthodoxy, Alvarez sides with what she calls the "minority view", which includes such thinkers as Jonathan Dancy, Joseph Raz, and others. It is important to point out that Alvarez does not intend to address the question whether Davidson was right in taking reasons to be causes of the actions they explain; this central aspect of the Davidsonian approach is not dealt with in this monograph.

The book's most significant claims can be stated as follows. All reasons are facts, understood as truths or true propositions; they are not mental states, such as beliefs or desires. The temptation to think of reasons as mental states comes partly from the ambiguity of the term "belief", which is used to refer sometimes to the act or state of believing and sometimes to its object, i.e., what is believed. It is not the former, but the latter, provided that it is true, i.e., a fact, that is the reason. So, my reason for going to the hospital is not my believing that my friend is there, but that my friend is there. All reasons belong then to the same ontological category, namely facts or true propositions; the distinction among kinds of reasons is not ontological; it is a distinction among the different roles that reasons can play in different contexts. There are three main such roles, namely justifying, motivating, and explaining. Reasons justify actions by presenting desirability aspects of the action and being premises of (actual or potential) practical reasoning. The distinction between motivating reasons ("reasons for") and explanatory reasons ("reasons why") is especially important for the book's line of argument. Though one and the same reason can both motivate someone to act and explain why she acts that way (and even justify her in so acting), this need not be so: the reason that motivates the agent to act need not be the reason that explains her action. Motivating and explaining reasons have tended to be conflated in the Humean/Davidsonian tradition that Alvarez opposes to. Not only reasons can motivate and explain; desires, emotions, purposes and other mental states, including beliefs, can as well; however, they cannot justify the action, which is an essential role of reasons; only true propositions (facts) can do so, and only they can be reasons.

Alvarez displays an impressive battery of arguments in favour of her views, thereby meeting several objections that those views can (too) easily raise. Her distinctions among ways in which different factors can motivate and explain, and among different kinds of action explanations are highly valuable and illuminating. The book is full of subtle and acute remarks about the complex field it deals with. However, I am less than fully convinced of the truth of some of its main claims. In the rest of this review I will try to justify my worries.

As we have seen, a central statement of the book is that all reasons are facts; reasons do not belong to different ontological categories, such as facts and mental states. Alvarez offers two considerations in favour of this view. The first is that "one and the
