absence Call it virtual foreplay if you want First Review From the Free Venice Beachhead News June 2004 Book Review QUEST A SEARCH FOR A SOUL MODERNKIND by Vincent Coppola Reviewed by Steve Goldman a former editor for Encyclopedia Britannica With great passion yet without a scintilla of mawkish sentimentality Coppola here makes the strong compelling case for love as the direct and primary implication of human consciousness That would be laudable by itself but these are not merely the pleasant musings of a decent well intentioned person This is and it is astounding tightly reasoned philosophy based on acute astute observation and profound and powerful argument Building on Descartes whom he explicitly reverses on the fundamental matter of proof of personal experience and Kant who seems indispensable to all who came after Coppola emerges with a distinctive and compassionate American existentialism that is unlike anything heretofore With strongly grounded links to modern cosmology evolutionary theory and sheer phenomenology of consciousness in space time Coppola delivers a ringing statement of free will so sorely needed in this era of burgeoning biological reductionist determinism This in turn yields a ringing adduction of the ontological primacy of self with commensurately devastating attacks on any variety of teeny bopping reductionism chemical biological physical or psychological and as well on any religious philosophical tradition usually Asian which explicitly denies or tries to eradicate the self I myself exist and I can love is the rigorously derived powerfully demonstrated theorem which is the first principal here What is more the revolutionary optional theology Quest proposes seems to at last settle that huge and perennial question for contemporary times Additionally and astonishingly and with philosophical deftness and gracious style Coppola's secular Christology evinces sacred humanitarian values again so needed in this era Coppola is a highly trained professional philosopher a prodigiously well read and deeply thoughtful theorist and analyst whose similarity to the preponderant mentality in his field is only superficial That is because Vincent V Virom is a philosopher in the all but abandoned grand tradition
