

Hydraulic Pump

804 Variable Displacement

Operation

The hydraulic pump is a small lightweight compact unit containing single piston pump A components, which is able to supply two equal flows to the hydraulic system. Mounted on the back of the pump body is a gear pump B supplying oil to the dozer, slew and swing circuits.

The piston pump rotating group of components seal against a fixed valve plate C in the pump casing. The valve plate has a single groove S machined for suction, but two concentric pressure grooves P1 & P2 both bridging the piston bores in the rotating barrel D, the outer groove supplies one hydraulic circuit whilst the inner groove supplies the second, both circuits receive equal flows.

The piston pump has a constant horsepower control E which responds to hydraulic system pressure demands, as pressure in the circuits rise so the volume of oil being pumped into the circuits decreases, maintaining the horsepower demands within the power output of the engine and preventing an engine stall situation.

The constant horsepower control, or summator, is a simple design incorporating a trunnion mounted 'swash plate' F which governs the stroke of the pistons in the pump barrel. This swash plate is spring loaded to an angle matching the maximum piston stroke hence maximum flow position. As the pistons G and barrel D rotate, driven by the engine, the swash plate draws the pistons out of the barrel, filling the vacated space on top of the piston with oil, once past top dead centre the swash plate pushes the pistons back into the barrel displacing the oil out into the hydraulic circuits of the machine.

When the machine starts to dig the pressures in the circuits begin to rise, this is sensed back to the pump and registers against the crown of the pistons G as the barrel rotates. The force of the pressure felt on the piston crowns is transmitted onto the swash plate and once the spring force of the summator is exceeded, the swash plate angle progressively decreases. This in turn decreases the piston stroke reducing the volume of oil pumped into the hydraulic circuits.

The gear pump is a fixed displacement pump, and should this come under pressure whilst the machine is digging, the horsepower demands on the engine will increase. However, there is a pilot gallery H sensing gear pump pressure, running through the main pump housing to a plunger J behind the swash plate. This increases the load against the summator springs E decreasing the angle of swash plate further and so reducing the piston pump flows thus maintaining a constant horsepower demand on the engine.
