A Crime of the Under-Seas Guy Newell Boothby, 1905-01-01 There is an old saying that one half of the world does not know how the other half lives but how true this is very few of us really understand In the East indeed it amounts almost to the marvellous There are men engaged in trades there some of them highly lucrative of which the world in general has never heard and which the ordinary stay at home Englishman would in all probability refuse to believe even if the most trustworthy evidence were placed before him For instance on the evening from which I date the story I am now about to tell you three of us were seated chatting together in the verandah of the Grand Oriental Hotel at Colombo We were all old friends and we had each of us arrived but recently in Ceylon McDougall the big red haired Scotchman who was sitting on my right had put in an appearance from Tuticorin by a British India boat only that morning and was due to leave again for Burmah the following night As far as I could gather he earned his living mainly by smuggling dutiable articles into other countries where the penalty if one is caught is a fine of at least one thousand pounds or the chance of receiving upwards of five years imprisonment The man in the big chair next to him was Callingway a Londoner who had hailed the day before from South America travelling in a P and O steamer from Australia He was tracking an absconding Argentine Bank Manager and as it afterwards transpired was when we came in contact with him on the point of getting possession of the money with which the other had left the country Needless to say he was not a Government servant nor were the Banking Company in question aware of his endeavours Lastly there was myself Christopher Collon aged thirty six whose walk in life was even stranger if such a thing were possible than those of the two men I have just described One thing at any rate is certain and that is that if I had been called upon to give an accurate description of myself and my profession at that time I should have found it extremely difficult to do so Had I been the possessor of a smart London office a private secretary and half a dozen corresponding clerks I should probably have called myself a private detective on a large scale or as they put it in the advertisement columns of our daily papers a Private Enquiry Agent Yet that description would scarcely have suited me I was that and something more At any rate it was a pretty hard life and by the same token a fairly hazardous one This will be the better understood when I say that one day I might receive a commission by cablegram from some London firm who we will suppose had advanced goods to an Indian Rajah and were unable to obtain payment for them It was my business to make my way to his headquarters as soon as possible and to get the money out of him by the best means in my power eating nothing but what was cooked for me by my own servant meanwhile As soon as I had done with him I might be sent on very much the same sort of errand to a Chinese Mandarin in Hankow or Canton or possibly to worry a gold mining concession or something of the sort out of one of the innumerable Sultans of the protected Malayan States those charming places where the head of the State asks you to dinner at six and you are found at midnight with six inches of cold krise in your abdomen On one occasion I remember being sent from Singapore to Kimberley at three hours notice to meet and escort a Parsee diamond merchant from that town to Calcutta And what was funnier still though we travelled to Cape Town together and even shared the same cabin on board the steamer afterwards he never for an instant suspected that I was spying upon him
