

1. Abstracts consist of several kinds, ranging from abstracts through the use of abstracting and indexing. They are brief, standardized statements (usually 100 to 250 words) summarizing an original publication without the original text. Abstracts are abstracted from a variety of published information. Furthermore, at the end of each chapter, together with other end-of-the-chapter items, are abstracts of significant works that have appeared in the past year.
2. Indexing involves the organization of information in a systematic manner. Indexing is a systematic method of identifying the location of information in a document or a collection. The process involves the selection of a list of subjects or topics, usually a thesaurus or subject list, against which terms are used.
3. Indexing is a systematic method of identifying the location of information. It is a process of selecting a list of subjects or topics, usually a thesaurus or subject list, against which terms are used.
