Connecting Links

A connecting link is a component of a climbing system that connects other components. Ropes are one type of connecting link.

Ropes used in securing the climbing line or in moving laryard must be self-closing and self-locking. Carabiners are available in a wide range of sizes, shapes, and constructions, with various locking mechanisms. Carabiners used in climbing must be self-closing and self-locking (triple-action). Carabiners must be used along their major axis. Quick link is a type of connecting link; they should be used in a pinch. All connecting links must meet strength standards when used in climbing.

Spit-Tails

Various "rope tools" are used in climbing, including hitch cords. A hitch cord is a separate, short rope used to tie a climbing hitch. It is typically a small rope used in the climbing line and is used to secure the climbing line and is used to secure the climbing line. Hitch cords frequently are stitched or spliced.

Rope components used in a climbing system must meet the minimum strength standards for climbing lines.

Mechanical Friction Devices

Mechanical friction devices function in place of, or in addition to, a friction hitch. They provide friction on the climbing line for ascending and work positioning. They have a device that provides the additional friction on the climbing line. They are used to secure a climber using a rope.

Climbing

Climbing is a sport that involves ascending and descending a vertical surface. It is a physical activity that requires strength, endurance, and skill. Climbing is a popular sport that has many different styles and techniques. Climbing is a sport that involves ascending and descending a vertical surface. A throttle is a mechanical device that enables a climber to control the rope. Attached to the rope, it is used to secure a rope. Ascenders are used for ascending and descenders for descending. Toothed ascenders must be used on compatible ropes. In most configurations, two attachment points on the rope and/or a rope are required.

Friction-Saving Devices

Friction-saving devices, also referred to as friction savers or carbide savers, are devices that are used to reduce friction at the tie-in point in the tree. The most common designs employ rope or webbing. The most common design is the double-ring type. Reducing friction at the tie-in point reduces wear on both the rope and the tree. While this reduces more consistent friction (and performance), it also creates additional friction at the tie-in point, so the climber must be sure to use the correct technique of their hitch cord or split-tail.
