

Reusing structural steel: what's in the new IStructE guide?

Florian Jones previews the guidance on reuse of structural steelwork that forms part of the Institution's forthcoming publication, Circular economy and reuse: guidance for designers.

As an outcome of the climate emergency fast-track in recent years, and the continued on-finding steel, along its material life-cycle towards a sustainable future, there has been an increased focus on reuse of existing buildings. However, where a building cannot be repurposed or adapted, it creates a secondary approach to the reuse of buildings as a potential material bank, offering a source of structural steel materials for future projects.

Steel is already regarded as a 'circular material', with assessments of steel adopted at the end of its last useful life globally¹. However, with around 30% of steel used reported in the UK compared with only 20% reused², there is a clear opportunity to increase the reuse of steel. It is estimated that, in the UK, between 40–60% of steel building material could be then using steel salvaged from decommissioned buildings³.

This article provides a brief introduction to Chapter 15 of the Institution's newly released Circular economy and reuse guide, which focuses on reuse of steel.

What's in the guide?

Chapter 15 begins by summarising the history and potential future benefits of reusing structural steelwork, with reuse of steel being a common activity as far as IStructE⁴, supported with a useful overview of IStructE's reuse of steel. It then considers the history of building project and global initiatives, noting that, as a result of reuse, a reused steel increases the total steel tonnage of a design by more than 30% compared with a new steel. It then describes how a global standard for reusing steel is being developed.

This chapter then goes on to look at options for reusing structural steelwork and the guide to available resources. These are first listed as presented in descending order from highest to lowest potential reuse value, as follows:

1. Reuse of steelwork in situ within an existing building
2. Reuse of steelwork as part of an existing steel-framed structure in a different location
3. Reuse of individual members as is, or with minimal reworking
4. Reuse of steelwork as scrap

Reuse in situ is covered elsewhere in the guide, with Chapter 16 focusing on options 2–4 which require relocation of the steel.

Table 1: Available guidance relating to reuse of steel (adapted from Table 2 of Chapter 15)

Organisation	Document	Summary
British Construction Steel Association (BCSA)	Steel specification for the purchase of structural steelwork	Applied to suppliers of steelwork who placed up the material as designed structural steel sections for the fabrication of structural steelwork
BCSA	BCSA Annex 2 – Sustainability Specification	Specifies general requirements and provides for achieving environmentally sustainable steel building construction
Steel Construction Institute (SCI)	Publication P422 ⁵ Structural Steel Reuse	Manual for reusing structural steelwork, which provides a route for certification of reclaimed structural steelwork
SCI	Publication P428 ⁶ Appraisal of Existing Iron and Steel Structures	Deals mainly with building structures in cast and wrought iron, and in steel up to 1960
UK Building Regulations	Materials and Workmanship, Appendix Document 7	Building materials can be reused if the material can perform the function for which it is intended
European Commission for Constructional Steelwork	European recommendations for reuse of steelwork in single-storey buildings	Guidance for structural engineers relating to design using reclaimed steelwork and designing structures to future adaptability, dismantlability and reuse with an emphasis on single-storey industrial buildings
Institution of Structural Engineers	Appraisal of existing structures (2nd edition)	Guidance for structural engineers on appraising and testing existing structures for refurbishment
