

Carabiners are available in a wide open, closed, and constructed, with or without locking mechanisms. Carabiners may be self-closing and self-latching (single-action), Carabiners must make their major axis. Quick Link at connecting links; they should be used. All connecting links must meet strength standards when used.

various "rope tools" including hitch cords is a separate, short line to tie a climbing hitch. It is typically a small-diameter climbing line and is not a climbing line and is not a climbing line. Hitch cords frequently are attached or applied to the main rope.

Roof components used in a climbing system must meet the minimum strength standards for climbing.

Mechanical Friction devices. Friction in place of, or in addition to, is friction hitches. They are placed in lines on the climbing line for ascending, descending, and work positioning. They have the advantage of providing the ability to hold a climber in place.

Ascenders is a mechanical device that enables a climber to ascend a rope. Attached to the rope, the ascender will grip in one direction (usually) and slide in the other. Ascenders are used for ascent, descent, and for working on a rope, for fall arrest, and for descending. Technical ascenders must be used on compatible ropes. In most configurations, two attachment points on the rope must be used.

...-saving devices, are devices that are designed to reduce friction at the tie-in point in the tree. The most common designs employ rope or webbing at the tie-in point—double-ripping type. Reducing friction at the tie-in point reduces wear on both the rope (or webbing) and the climbing line. While this reduces more consistent friction (and performance), it also creates additional friction at the hitch, so the climber must be sure to use the right type of hitch cord or split-tail
