

Reusing structural steel: what's in the new IStructE guide?

Florian Jones previews the guidance on reuse of structural steelwork that forms part of the Institution's forthcoming publication, Circular economy and reuse: guidance for designers.

As evidenced by the climate emergency fast-track in recent years, and the continued and increasing focus on sustainable design towards a net-zero future, there has been an increased focus on reuse of existing buildings. However, where a building cannot be repurposed or refitted, it creates a secondary approach to the reuse of buildings as a potential material bank, offering a source of structural steel resources for future projects.

Steel is already regarded as a 'circular material', with assessments of steel adopted at the end of its last useful life globally¹. However, with around 30% of steel used reported to have ended up as scrap², there is a clear opportunity to 'rethink the greater reuse of steel'. It is estimated that, in the UK, between 40–60% of steel building material could be then using steel salvaged from decommissioned buildings³.

This article provides a brief introduction to Chapter 15 of the Institution's newly released Circular economy and reuse guide, which focuses on reuse of steel.

What's in the guide?

Chapter 15 begins by summarising the history and potential benefits of reusing structural steelwork, with reuse steel being a carbon intensity as low as 10%⁴ compared with a steel of average of 170%⁵ compared to new steelwork. It then considers the history of building project and global emissions, noting that, as a result of reuse, if reused steel increases the total steel tonnage of a design by more than 30% compared with a new steel, it may be better than a green equivalent for designs this size.

This chapter then goes on to look at options for reusing structural steelwork and the guide to available resources. These are first listed as presented in descending order from highest to lowest potential reuse value:

1. Reuse steelwork in situ within an existing building.
2. Reuse steel as part of an existing steel-framed structure in a different location.
3. Reuse individual members as is, or cut and use as purlins.
4. Reuse as scrap metal.

Figure 15.1 is a broad overview of the guide, with Chapter 15 focusing on options 3–4 which require relocation of the steel.

Table 1: Available guidance relating to reuse of steel (adapted from Table 2 of Chapter 15)

Organisation	Document	Summary
British Construction Steel Association (BCSA)	Steel specification for the purchase of structural steelwork	Applied to suppliers of steelwork who placed up the market as designed structural steel sections for the fabrication of structural steelwork
BCSA	BCSA Annex 2 – Sustainability Specification	Specifies general requirements and provides for achieving environmentally sustainable steel building construction
Steel Construction Institute (SCI)	Publication P422 Structural Steel Reuse	Manual for reusing structural steelwork, which provides a route for re-certification of reclaimed structural steelwork
SCI	Publication P428 Appraisal of Existing Iron and Steel Structures	Deals mainly with building structures in cast and wrought iron, and in steel up to 1960
UK Building Regulations	Materials and Workmanship, Appendix Document 7	Building materials can be reused if the material can perform the function for which it is intended
European Commission for Constructional Steelwork	European recommendations for reuse of steelwork in single-storey buildings	Guidance for structural engineers relating to design using reclaimed steelwork and designing structures to future adaptability, dismantling and reuse with an emphasis on single-storey industrial buildings
Institution of Structural Engineers	Appraisal of existing structures (2nd edition)	Guidance for structural engineers on appraising and testing existing structures for refurbishment
