

Lab 10: Molecular PCR and ELISA

Background Information

Each week you completed exercises related to the following concepts and laboratory techniques: immunology (IMM), DNA sequencing (DNA), and the polymerase chain reaction (PCR). Today you will gain hands-on experience performing a Polymerase Chain Reaction (PCR) and an enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA).

PCR is a versatile technique that has been useful in detecting and identifying infectious etiologic agents associated with AIDS. In combination, PCR and enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA) methods are used to detect past infections. This exercise is important for further understanding the development and spread of the virus. Encouragement is made that PCR cannot be used to detect past infections because of more prevalence of the body fluid or specific detection of time.

Part I: PCR

Overview of PCR

Polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is a method for amplifying an entire viral infectious agent. Each of the individual base pairs within specific target sequences, and through the polymerase chain reaction (PCR) is copied in an exponential manner through repeated cycles. In order to amplify a specific region of the genome, oligonucleotide sequences that bind complementary with each primer sequence are synthesized (Figure 1), and the binding sites are used, called thermocycling, to facilitate exponentially increasing numbers of the target sequence in each cycle.

Figure 1: PCR process. The process involves heating DNA, usually between 90-95°C, to separate the double-stranded genome into two complementary sequences. Thermocycling is designed to amplify the target sequence (shown in red text).
