Governing Universities Catherine Bargh, Peter Scott, David Smith, 1996 The governance of higher education in the UK was regarded until recently as the dignified element within the constitution of the academy University councils were trustees rather than directors But governance is now a contested area and in particular lay governors are seen as key change agents responsible for reforming the old donnish culture of elite higher education Governing Universities explores who governors are how they conceive of their new roles and what they think about higher education policy It examines whether governing bodies have become more actively engaged in setting institutional policies and whether governors have changed the old culture or gone native It sets university governance in the large context of the massification and marketization of higher education and draws comparisons both with other parts of the public sector and the private sector and with governance in North America and the rest of Europe
