

Global Inequality

In his book, Material World, Peter Menzel and his staff interview and photograph people whose earnings place them somewhere near the middle of the income distribution in their respective societies. Looking at who constitutes a society's middle class and what they have and comparing their situation to counterparts in poorer and richer societies are particularly illuminating. Society's middle class marks off the standard

Rick Skeen is a cable splicer for a utility company in Pearland, Texas. The money that he and his wife Pettie—who is employed half time as a teacher in a Christian academy—earn puts them right in the center of the American middle class. They have a nice 1,600-square-foot home in a suburb of Houston, two kids, a dog. Certainly, there are many things the Skeen family would dread losing, but it is a safe bet that the array of kitchen appliances sitting on the washer, range, and dryer in the upper right-hand corner of the photograph would not be among them.

Ambrosio and Carmen Castillo Balderras and their four children are the Skeens' Mexican counterparts. Their home in Guadalajara, however, is less than half the size of the Skeens' and accommodates half again as many people. They too have possessions, both functional and prized, but they amount to far fewer things. Ernesto is a distributor of wholesale produce, does freelance welding, and when he has time, continues building his home. Carmen is a homemaker. Their income puts them in the Mexican middle class. Nevertheless, in dollar terms it is less than one seventh of what the Skeens earn.

Whose innovators emphasize control rather than flexibility during innovation By addressing these questions the author demonstrates that the way nations innovate often has deep and sometimes counter intuitive implications for how they compare in many areas of socio economic performance For example although venture capital is most active in Anglo Saxon economies it seems that venture capital performance in stimulating innovation is also poorest in precisely these countries On the issue of employment the author argues that whilst technological innovation in Anglo Saxon economies creates jobs innovation in European economies destroys jobs Nations also differ in the nature of income inequality driven by innovation While innovation pushes top earners further ahead of median earners in Anglo Saxon economies it drags bottom earners further behind the median in European economies Finally varieties of capitalism also differ in their ability to cope with the volatilities of innovation While Anglo Saxon economies face a trade off between low volatility and high innovation output these two goals seem jointly achievable in European economies
