Panties Marcus Youssef, Niall McNeil, 2018 King Arthur's Night and Peter Panties are two plays with music by co-writers Niall McNeil and Marcus Youssef with songs by Veda Hille. McNeil is a professional actor whose life includes Down syndrome. Youssef is one of Canada's leading contemporary playwrights. In these plays based on the iconic King Arthur and Peter Pan stories, entirely new worlds and languages are invented. McNeil's singular voice and imaginative landscape are at the centre of these works. Niall's genius as a writer is his ability to associate and to create through dialogue and play with a seemingly preternatural ability to riff and shift perspective, subverting expectations. The results of this are counterintuitive, absurd, disarming, confusing, hilarious, frightening, and occasionally heart-stopping. In the worlds of King Arthur's Night and Peter Panties, there is a permeable boundary between the source material, pop culture, and McNeil's own world. McNeil has a gift for imagining links between characters and situations that defy traditional categorizations like fictional and real. In this work, McNeil and Youssef challenge the classifications neurotypicals assume must be the only legitimate means available to perceive and name the world. They're not. There are worlds none of us can name or even imagine within every one of us. That's why we have art to offer ourselves a glimpse. Art-making and theatre, in particular, is a natural place for people to come together to define new, radically inclusive ways of working together across historical presumptions about difference that have shunned and isolated many of our fellow human beings for millennia. An assumption at the heart of this collaboration: every single one of us is very good at some things and very bad at others. No exceptions. All of us. Every single one. King Arthur's Night and Peter Panties were commissioned and presented by Canada's most prestigious theatre festivals, Luminato and the National Arts Centre, and PuSh. They are among the first plays by a writer with Down syndrome published in this country.
