
Following the 2004 election, however, a 2005 pollster's report showed that 69% of voters wanted to see the current Congress (the 109th Congress) re-elected. The overwhelming 90% confidence in the President's leadership, however, was not shared by voters who were not satisfied by the current Congress. As a result, Congress is not expected to have significant power to influence the President's policies. Instead, voters' confidence in the President's leadership is expected to play a more active role in determining whether a president will seek re-election in 2012 or govern as a lame-duck in 2013. The 2005 pollster's report also showed that 69% of voters wanted to see the current Congress (the 109th Congress) re-elected, even though the 2004 election was held in November. The pollster's report also showed that 69% of voters wanted to see the current Congress (the 109th Congress) re-elected, even though the 2004 election was held in November.
