Modeling Aircraft Contrails and Emission Plumes for Climate Impacts Alexander Dean Naiman, 2011 Aircraft emissions lead to contrails and change cloud coverage in the upper troposphere lower stratosphere but their quantitative impact on climate is highly uncertain As environmental policy turns toward regulating anthropogenic climate change components it will be necessary to improve quantification of the climate impacts of aviation Toward this end we present two models of aircraft emissions The first model is a large eddy simulation LES with three dimensional eddy resolving flow physics and ice deposition sublimation microphysics Modeled ice properties cloud optical depths and contrail width growth rates are consistent with observational field studies A series of sensitivity cases shows the effect of various parameters over twenty minutes of simulation time The analysis focuses on properties such as contrail optical depth and cross sectional width that are relevant to climate impacts Vertical wind shear is found to have the strongest effect on these properties through the kinematic spreading of the contrail In cases with no shear optical depth is most sensitive to aircraft type and ambient humidity One model parameter the effective emission index of ice crystals is also found to affect optical depth A subset of the LES cases is run for two hours of simulation time to approach the scale of dynamical time steps modeled by global climate simulations These cases use more realistic ice microphysics including sedimentation and forced ambient turbulence both of which are processes that control contrail development at late times The second model is a simple low cost parameterization of aircraft plume dynamics intended to be used as a subgrid plume model SPM within large scale atmospheric simulations The SPM provides basic plume cross section time advancement that has been used as a dilution model within a coupled global atmosphere ocean climate simulation to study the effects of aviation on air quality and climate Comparison to the twenty minute and two hour LES results demonstrates that the SPM captures important plume development characteristics under the effect of vertical shear and atmospheric turbulence
