It has been suggested that the "soft" and "green" sectors will be a source for employment. It is not difficult to see why some of these sectors could potentially contribute to employment. The green economy is likely to require additional and improved energy efficiency, particularly in the transport sector. This will mean more jobs for technicians, drivers, mechanics, engineers, etc. However, this means considerably higher investment, which will be dependent on further policy support from the government. There are also concerns that these changes will not be able to create enough jobs to offset those lost in other sectors.
