

Woman's silk gown

British, 18th

Source: Photo by Thomas
Lawson

The waist of this silk gown sets a complex system of lacing that makes its pattern of rose red ground and trails of white flowers reversible. It was worn in the 1740s; the gown was probably made then and altered in the following decades. The first neckline was in the 1740s, when the stomacher was replaced with buttoned tabs. There may have been two sleeve ruffles originally, and the upper one cut off to leave a gathered border above a single ruffle.

Many surviving silk garments have been remodelled and updated through several decades of fashionable changes. Clothing was passed to poorer relatives, friends or servants, as well as to the local church, where the expensive silks were converted into altar frontals and ecclesiastical vestments. Mrs Charlotte Papendick, an excellent needlework keeper and a companion to Queen Charlotte in the 1760s and 1770s, records in her diary how she kept a gown sent going for seven years, repeatedly altering its decoration.

Fashion, too, was not their antagonist in the matter of continual change. A silk gown would go on for years, a robe furnished up with new trimmings; and a young woman was rather complimented than otherwise when she exhibited some of her possessions, and might with no dissimulation herself repeat tale after tale in the same attire.
