Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a supervised walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 women who did not participate in the walking program. The subjects were assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks for physical and psychological health. The physical health measures included heart rate, blood pressure, and body mass index. The psychological health measures included self-rated health, anxiety, and depression. The results of the study showed that the walking program had a positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the subjects. The walking program group had significantly lower heart rate, blood pressure, and body mass index compared to the control group at 12 weeks. The walking program group also had significantly higher self-rated health, lower anxiety, and lower depression compared to the control group at 12 weeks. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

As noted earlier, the 1990s witnessed a dramatic increase in the number of U.S. firms operating in foreign markets. This growth was driven by a combination of factors, including technological advances, globalization, and the need for firms to diversify their product lines and expand their customer base. The following table provides a summary of the key factors contributing to this growth:
