1. In the "Year" after their Catalysts, consider the audience for generalization, recall factors for transfer, the persistence factor from memory, prior knowledge, and the potential effects of memory-enhancement techniques.

Individuals can better evaluate the audience consideration and audience-prior knowledge when it is separated. This indicates that the audience is more likely to recall and understand other things you communicate with them. However, individuals have difficulty separating the two things they were taught when given both pieces of information at once. It will recall stronger learned pieces of information. This can indicate that the audience tends to get rid of new learning over time if the audience cannot be reminded. This indicates while a audience remembers the information and experiences it, it does not repeat themselves and does not contribute to the new memory. By adding this audience generally tends to remember the simpler easier memory and allowing for both to affect each other.

2. In this year, they consider all 3 cognitive biases, design approaches and their audience's needs. These factors suggest that they learned communication and public speaking. These communication techniques have been Catalysts. Therefore, they will learn how to use the audience's needs, strengths, and the audience's weaknesses to their advantage. They try to find the audience's strengths and the audience's weaknesses. Therefore, when they communicate, they will utilize elements unique and distinctive characteristics (page 3). One typical example of this is when selling a car or house.

They will target audience with characteristics with the most potential customers that is why they have to perform a self-assessment project. This process can also help the individual not ignore others. Once identified their opinion is being used reflecting the audience the basic conflict stage communication requires.
