

Introduction: Historical Origins of International Criminal Law

CHEAH Wui Ling^{*} and CHOONG Xun Ning^{}

1.1 Introduction

International criminal law may be said to comprise “international rules” that declare “certain human behaviour punishable as crimes under international law”.¹ These rules aim to protect the “basic values” of the international community as well as the individual, values that are well grounded in the international legal order and are reflected in universal legal instruments such as the United Nations Charter and the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights.² The elaboration of these rules in various fora, and their implementation by different national and internationalised bodies, has resulted in an emerging international criminal justice system that is becoming more robust. Nevertheless international criminal law is still relatively young and undeveloped when compared to criminal legal systems at the national level. While we have come a long way, there is still much to be done to operationalise international criminal law in a way that fulfils its promises of accountability and justice.

^{*} CHEAH Wui Ling is Assistant Professor at the Faculty of Law, National University of Singapore (“NUS”). She is a qualified lawyer, called to the New York Bar, and has a diploma in arbitration from Queen Mary, University of London. She holds LL.B. and LL.M. degrees from NUS, a LL.M. from Harvard University, and a Diploma from the Academy of European Law, European University Institute. She thanks Morten Bergsmo, Gareth Richards, Anna Su and ZHANG Binsun for their invaluable substantive feedback, and the entire HOJCL editorial team.

^{} CHOONG Xun Ning is currently training to qualify as a solicitor in London. She holds an LL.B. in Law with Transnational Legal Studies from King’s College London, and won the Manches Prize for Family Law in 2013. Part of her degree includes a Diploma in Transnational Law from the Center for Transnational Legal Studies where she spent a year in 2011–2012.
