

Assignment:
Report due
Next week

You have been given an assignment. You must write a report. What is your first thought?

- a. "Hurrah! I love writing reports!"
- b. "Oh, no! Reports are so boring."
- c. "Huh? How do you write a report?"

If your answer was "a," you are one of the lucky students who naturally likes to research, organize, and write. This book will give you the opportunity to practice your skills and learn about different kinds of reports.

If you chose "b," you may have had an experience in the past writing a report. Perhaps you didn't get to write about something you enjoyed. Maybe you did not feel confident in your report writing skills. Or, maybe no one ever showed you how to make it interesting. This book will teach you how to write a good report . . . and have fun doing it!

Finally, if you answered "c," you might not have had the chance to write a report before. Or, you might have forgotten how to do it. Report writing is an important part of your education. You will most likely be assigned many reports in school. You also may write reports for your job after you graduate. This book will give you the knowledge you need and teach you step by step how to write a great report.

A report is a collection of information about a topic. It is a written or spoken piece that tells people facts and details that the writer finds important and interesting. The writer's job is to find and share that information in an interesting way.

An effective report is well researched, well organized, and well written. The goals of a report are to educate, to inform, and to keep the reader's attention.

In Writing a Report, you will learn how to write effective research reports, lab reports, book reports, oral reports, and news reports. Along the way, you just might discover that writing a report can be exciting.

Student Assignment: Think about a report you have seen or read. What was it about? What about it interested you? Write a paragraph about that report. Describe what you have learned.
